Native American artist Anna Johnson seeks to bridge the gap between the world she lives in and the culture she came from.

When she feels or experiences discrimination, Anna is moved to make a difference about social injustice, religion and spirituality, and other issues that Native Americans, women, LGBTQ+ and people everywhere face.

Anna is an enrolled member of the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa Indians. She is originally from Bismarck and has lived most of her life in North Dakota. She received her BFA in printmaking and drawing from NDSU and has been creating art here in Fargo and across the state ever since.

Anna seeks out opportunities to connect with the community through artist in residency programs at the Plains Art Museum and the West Acres Mall. She participates in the annual Native American Arts and Crafts Festival at the Plains and recently started contributing to public art projects such as the "Greetings from Fargo" mural downtown as well as having several other pieces of her work highlighted throughout Fargo and around the state.

Anna was recently named the Executive Director of The Human Family and is on the board of The Arts Partnership. She wants to stay involved and hopes to serve her community more in the future.
